MARLBOROUGH'S NOTE.

A Scrap of Paper Treasured by the Great Duke's Heirs.

A scrap of paper that carries one back to the very atmosphere of a great decisive battle in the world's history is among the historical treasures of Blenheim House. On the paper are a dozen lines scribbled in pencil. They were written by the Duke of Marlborough at the close of the fierce struggle at Blenheim.

The tumult of battle was rolling westward, where French and Bavarians were in disorderly retreat, with Marlborough's cavalry riding fiercely in their rear. The slopes of the hill and the marshy plain were strewn with 30,000 killed and wounded.

But Marlborough, with the excitement of the great fight yet strong within him, pulled up his horse on one of the little rustic bridges across the Schwanbach and scribbled these dozen lines to his wife in London to tell her of the great event.

Apparently the duke borrowed the scrap of paper from some member of his staff, for on the back of it are the faded items of a tavern bill. He used the parapet of the bridge for a writing desk. He had been seventeen hours in the saddle, most of that time riding in the very heart of one of the greatest battles in all history, yet the letters are firm in shape, a curious testimony to that serenely unshakable temperament that was Marlborough's most striking characteristic.—New York Herald.

AN INSOLENT FOP.

Beau Brummel's Impertinence and a Brewer's Tart Retort.

Beau Brummel, the famous English fop, was as notorious for his insolence as for his fine feathers. At the Pavilion, at Brighton, he ordered the footman to empty his snuffbox into the fire because a bishop had taken a pinch unasked. A man whom he had met at dinner offered him a lift in his carriage to Lady Jersey's ball. "Thank you exceedingly," said the beau, "but how are you to go? You would not like to get up behind, and I cannot be seen in the same carriage with you." He made no secret of his humble birth and when asked about his parents declared that "the poor old creatures both cut their throats years ago eating peas with a knife."

Once at least Brummel met his match. He was playing hazard at Brooks', when a well known alderman, a brewer, was one of the party.

"Come, Mashtub," said Brummel, who was the custer, "what's your bet?"

"Twenty-five guineas," was the reply.

"Well, then, have at the mayor's pony," said Brummel, who proceeded to cast and by a run of luck won the stake twelve times in succession. Pocketing the money, he thanked the brewer and promised that in future he would drink no one's porter but his. "I wish, sir," replied the brewer, "that every other blackguard in London would tell me the same."

A Long Sleep

By LOUISE B. CUMMINGS

Copyright by American Press Association, 1911.

There have been many cases of persons who have laid for months either asleep or in a trance, and there is one instance of a girl who lay eleven years in such condition. Therefore there is nothing improbable or, at least, impossible in the following story:

Jeannette De Forest when she was ten years old was run over by a wagon. She was picked up unconscious, carried home and a physician called in immediately. He examined the little girl carefully, found no severe contusions, no bones broken and, so far as he could judge, no internal injury. He said that she had doubtless lost consciousness from the shock she had received, but would soon come to herself.

Now Jeannette was the daughter of a very poor man. His father had been wealthy, but soon after his son's marriage the family property had been lost, and Jeannette had never known anything but poverty. She loved to hear her father talk of the "halcyon days," as he called them, when the family had lived in a big house in the center of extensive grounds and had everything one could desire. She had heard the homestead's various features described so often that she had gained quite a correct picture of it in her mind's eye. Her father, who was a visionary man, talked about buying the old place when "his ship came in," and Jeannette never tired of hearing him describe the room that would be hers.

Falling back on her pillows, she covered her eyes with her hands that she might collect her scattered senses. Surely she must be dreaming, and yet everything was as clear to her as it had ever been when she was awake. What could it mean—in the homestead, and a woman apparently between eighteen and twenty years of age?

Now, all these years that Jeannette had been passing and repassing about people passing and repassing about her. An old man had often sat by her bedside, looking at her curiously, as if studying her. He had often put his fingers on her wrists and had felt gently of her head. Later a young man had replaced him. He had put a sponge to the base of her brain, and she had felt a prickling all over her body. This young man had often looked down upon her, not curiously as the old one, but pityingly, wistfully, and with an unexpressed love in his eyes. This was the only part of her

Despite the doctor's assurance that the little girl would soon return to consciousness, she lay in a comatose condition, or one of slumber, for she appeared to be sleeping, year after year, without showing any sign of awakening.

One day, nine years after the accident, she opened her eyes. She was not in the dingy little room she had been accustomed to, but one furnished with every luxury. Moreover, she could look out of a window and see the leaves unfolding on the trees, whereas when she had gone to sleep it was winter. At some distance was a very high chimney, nearer the arched wire and glass of a large conservatory, besides other things her father had described to her, could be seen from the room he designed for her in the old homestead.

Thinking she must be dreaming, she blinked her eyes and tried to move. The latter was difficult, and somehow she felt very differently from when she had gone to sleep. She noticed that she very nearly filled the whole length of the bed. Managing to raise herself on her arm, she caught sight of her image in the mirrored door of a wardrobe. What was her astonishment to see the reflection of a woman instead of a child!

Falling back on her pillows, she covered her eyes with her hands that she might collect her scattered senses. Surely she must be dreaming, and yet everything was as clear to her as it had ever been when she was awake. What could it mean—in the homestead, and a woman apparently between eighteen and twenty years of age?

Now, all these years that Jeannette had been passing and repassing about people passing and repassing about her. An old man had often sat by her bedside, looking at her curiously, as if studying her. He had often put his fingers on her wrists and had felt gently of her head. Later a young man had replaced him. He had put a sponge to the base of her brain, and she had felt a prickling all over her body. This young man had often looked down upon her, not curiously as the old one, but pityingly, wistfully, and with an unexpressed love in his eyes. This was the only part of her long sleep that seemed to at all real, though all her visions were fitting, and as to the time between them she could take no account of that.

She lay wondering how she had been removed in one night. This was all she knew of the interval—from her tumbledown home into this fine mansion, how she should have so increased in size, and thinking of the young man who had looked at her lovingly. Suddenly the door opened and she heard a voice say:

"Examine her carefully today, doctor. She has shown signs of awakening since you were last here."

"I will," replied a voice that sounded familiar to Jeannette, and in walked the young man who had appeared to her in her sleep.

When he saw her looking at him wide awake he started. Then a sudden joy lit up his face, and, raising his eyes, he exclaimed:

"My God, I think thee!"
